1 INTRODUCTION AND BACKGROUND INFORMATION

In South Africa, the term township often refers to underdeveloped segregated urban areas that, from the late 19th century until the end of apartheid, were reserved for non-whites, namely Indians, Africans, and Coloureds. Townships were usually built on the periphery of towns and cities. The term township also has a distinct legal meaning in South Africa's land title system, which carries no racial connotations.

During the era of apartheid in South Africa, any person who was not "white" as per the classification of the Apartheid South African government eventually found themselves living in a township. "Black people" were evicted from properties that were in areas designated as "white only" and were removed and forced into segregated townships as per their racial classification. Separate townships were established for the three designated non-white race groups - black people, Coloureds, and Indians - per the Population Registration Act of 1950. The Group Areas Act was specific legislation that enabled the apartheid government to do this. The Apartheid government had gone to great lengths to divide the majority of South Africa into small, distinct groups. It used further means, such as language and culture, to create small groupings within these three broad non-white groups. Areas were then designed spatially through names and language that forcibly placed people into these groups.

Townships have a specific spatial design based on Apartheid principles that either limit the movement of people for security and other means or classify them according to language, culture, and race. Unique to South Africa is that townships, as we have come to understand them in the South African context, are out of design rather than an organic natural flow of poverty or economic condition of people because of the migration and the socio-economic conditions they may have found themselves in.

The new democratic dispensation faced similar challenges in creating homes for the many in areas that were restricted far from business activity due to the increasing rate of urbanization as droves of people migrated to the cities in search of work opportunities. Therefore, the township economies are characterized by the following:

- Cheap labor to established economic nodes and centers of production. They absorb new migrants/surplus labor.

TOR for the drafting and gazetting white paper on Township and Rural economies

- The disproportionate concentration of lower-income households and lower skill levels define them.
- Townships were defined by the relative absence of formal retail and commercial facilities, which resulted in leakage of consumer spending to more established areas—too little income retention in townships. Lately, this trend has changed due to the invasion of townships by large retail malls.
- They are characterized by an informal, fragmented, and non-competitive real estate/property market.
- Private sector investment levels are still deficient while slowly increasing in specific relatively healthy-located townships.

The department has identified Township and Rural economies as one of the three (3) catalytic projects to be implemented in the current financial year 2022/23. However, given the scope of work, the multi-year project will be implemented over two years. Thus, the project will be implemented in phases and be concluded in the next financial year with the development of legislation.
