2. The tender documentation states that the following is a mandatory returnable document:

“Certified copy of valid company’s Private Security Sector Provident Fund (PSSPF) certificate or valid exemption letter from PSSPF.”

Our understanding is that the PSSPF primarily applies to employees within the private security sector, particularly security officers/guards. The scope of this tender, however, relates to the maintenance of electronic security systems and does not include the provision of guarding or security officer services. Could you therefore please confirm whether the PSSPF certificate or exemption letter is still a mandatory requirement?

Answer:

To have a provident fund is mandatory even if it is not necessarily a Private Security Sector Provident Fund, but you must have a provident fund such as for instance, Sanlam or any other alternative one applicable to your scope of your work. If your Company is not a security company, then you should be registered under for example, Technicians Provident Fund.
