1. SCOPE OF WORK

1.1. DESCRIPTION

1.1.1 CONTEXTUAL INTRODUCTION TO RAND WATER

Rand Water is a bulk water services provider, supplying potable water in excess of 4400 mega liters a day. Its service area includes Gauteng and peripheral provinces, with an expansive interconnected distribution pipeline network greater than 3000km. Rand Water employs conventional water treatment at two primary stations, namely Zuikerbosch and Vereeniging. The former processes 70-80% of the total volume. Rand Water employs two treatment regimes, organic coagulants or lime and activated silica. The extensive length of pipeline warrants three stages of disinfection. Reference is made to the table below documenting treatment processes and associated chemicals at each site.

Treatment process	Chemical	Plant/Site*
Coagulation	Calcined lime Activated silica Organic coagulants	Primary Stations
Flocculation	None	Primary Stations
Sedimentation	None	Primary Stations
Carbonation (Stabilisation)	Carbon dioxide	Primary Stations
Filtration	Ferric chloride as a filter aid	Primary Stations
Disinfection (primary)	Chlorine	Primary Stations
Disinfection (secondary)	Chlorine Ammonia (formation of monochloramine)	Booster Stations
Disinfection (tertiary)	Sodium hypochlorite Calcium hypochlorite	Tertiary Stations
Water treatment residue processing	Polyacrylamide	Panfontein

*Site classification and location documented in section 1.1.3

1.1.2 PROJECT CONTEXT AND DELIVERABLE

Rand Water seeks to optimise chemical consumption from an informed assessment of decision variables and economic factors impacting Rand Water, while maintaining drinking water quality production specifications.

Water treatment chemicals are a significant cost to Rand Water's business, escalating in recent years. The importance of treatment chemicals cannot be overstated in the production of compliant drinking water, both locally and globally. It is for this reason that Rand Water seeks to craft a chemical optimisation strategy by undertaking an in-depth systems analysis. The end goal is a reporting structure that considers all facets and dynamics contributing to chemical expenditure.

The researcher (supplier) is required to creatively investigate various pockets of reporting, introducing process integration and optimisation. This entails identification of synergies in the overall production process, commencing with raw water analysis culminating at tertiary potable water production. In recent years there has been a notable change in the raw water, namely an increase in natural organic matter. Chemical consumption, particularly chlorine has increased significantly. Against the backdrop of limited chlorine production for water treatment in South Africa, this increased demand is proving challenging and costly.

This investigation extends to, but is not limited to the following variables:

- Detailed analysis of raw water quality and the consequent effect on chemical dosages. Rainfall patterns, Vaal Dam levels and pollution factors for indicative periods must be analysed as well as future predictive modelling.
- Overall production process, extending from primary, secondary and tertiary disinfection as well as treatment of the waste residue. Actual chemical dosages versus the required chemical dosages at all stages.
- An exploration of treatment regime options, namely lime and activated silica versus organic coagulants. Benchmarking and proposing of alternate treatment regimes for expansive operations such as Rand Water, paying special attention to treatment cost and efficacy. Rand Water's treatment volumes as well as length and complexity of pipeline network to be considered.

- The viability of backward integration for Rand Water, exploring both in-house transport logistics and chemical manufacturing (including pre-cursors).
- Product market analysis, dynamics and exposure.

Since the on-set of the Covid pandemic, together with local chlorine production complexities, chemical rates are estimated to increase significantly during the 2023/2024 fiscal. The local chlor-alkali market is in a serious supply-demand nexus, affecting primarily chlorine as well as derivatives such as hydrochloric acid, sodium hypochlorite, calcium hypochlorite and ferric chloride. Products that could be procured locally now require importing, for example, hydrochloric acid, which is a significant precursor in the production of organic coagulant blends. The Covid pandemic and Ukraine/Russian war has impacted ocean freight costs.

The upward chemical cost trajectory is attributed to chemical pricing due to local supply factors and global economics, as well as a deterioration in raw water quality. Rand Water's chemical consumption is a complex network of interdependencies, comprising of an array of external and internal variables with nonlinear relationships, that may or may not be predictable. A systems theory approach is required, advising Rand Water on process optimisation opportunities and constraints, using first principle thinking. The parametric uncertainties must be analysed for practical consideration. Optimisation opportunities needs to manage the upward gradient of the cost function.

The intention is to develop a detailed report, as well as a practical plug and play monthly chemical consumption report considering all interdependencies.
